

Woman game changer – explorers

Jay LEE

National Geographic Society-Asia, Korea

Over the past 130 years, the National Geographic Society has pushed the boundaries of exploration to further understanding of our planet and empower the global community to generate solutions for a healthier and more sustainable future. Our goal is to identify, cultivate, and develop the world-changers of today and tomorrow. Our grant recipients are—and have always been—the heart and soul of what we do. When we award a grant, we're not just funding a project. We are also inviting a scientist, engineers, conservationist, educator, or storyteller to join a passionate community of like-minded, global leaders. These leaders are National Geographic Explorers.

Whether they are exploring uncharted corners of our planet, advancing our understanding of the world around us, or working to protect at-risk species and their habitats, National Geographic explorers are going further, digging deeper, and pushing harder to change something much bigger than themselves. We also embrace Woman explorers who are paving the way for new generations of scientists, journalists, photographers, and educators to make a positive impact on our planet.
